

A MODEL FOR THE SURFACE LEVEL OF NARRATION OF THE THEME "COMBAT" IN SOUTH SLAVIC EPIC SONGS

HEDA JASON

Israel Ethnographic Society, Jerusalem

"Combat" is the basic narrative theme in South Slavic epic songs. The author intends to build its complete syntagmatic model, as the first step in the description of the whole repertoire of themes. The plot-model for the combat can be divided into three main parts (preparation for the combat, the battle / duel, aftermath of the combat), which can be further subdivided into several narrative sections. These sections are the basic units of the narrative description. They comprise the singer's comments, his addresses to the audience and information about the epic plot. After describing the abstract syntagmatic model, which consists of the list of tale roles and of the summary of narrative sections, the author applies the model on the Croatian epic song "The Battle at Kosovo".

0. Introduction

0.1. A syntagmatic model is presented here which intends to describe the surface narrative patterns of the basic plot in South Slavic epic oral folk tradition. The model has been worked out on South Slavic epic songs and should be regarded to fit solely the description of this particular epic tradition. Much further investigation is needed and many more traditions have to be analyzed before more general models can be tackled.

0.2. We use the concepts and tools developed for the analysis of prose oral literature by the Russian Formalists at the beginning of this century to build a description of the basic theme's plot (see Nikiforov 1927/73, Propp 1928/68, Erlich 1955, Pomorska 1968, Jason 1977b). These tools have been amended by Jason (1971, 1975, 1977a, 1984; see also Jason and Segal 1977, Dan 1977 and Drory 1977).

0.3. "Epic" is here used as a label for an ethnopoetic genre, an oral work of literature, in verse or in prose, in which man confronts his fellow in strife and combat. The combat is fought mostly as a physical struggle and less often by use of cunning and magical means (after Jason 1975, pp. 49-51). As defined here, the genre exists in the Euro-Afro-Asian cultural area (encompassing Christian Europe, Moslem North Africa, Near East and Central Asia, and (non-tribal) India (Moslem and Hindu) and in cultures strongly influenced by these three umbrella cultures, like Buddhist Tibet and Mongolia).

0.4. The South Slavic repertoire of oral epic features many narrative themes. The author considers the basic theme to be the description of a combat and therefore analyzed this theme as a first step. It is supposed that various combinations of sections from this basic theme, amended by additional narrative sections shall make it possible to describe the whole repertoire of themes. The author plans to describe these at a future time.

Two types of combat are found in the South Slavic materials: the battle between groups of characters and the duel between champions. The battle can be fought between two groups of characters ranging in size from a small band of brigands, a wedding procession, to an organized small army, as in fights and raids between villages and all the way to the large army an empire can muster. A combat can also take place between two champions as a duel, or between a champion and a group of characters. Our model will follow the large battle as this description of a duel, while a duel does not use all narrative units which the battle features.

0.5. The plot-model for the combat can be divided into three main parts: preparation for the combat

the battle/duel

aftermath of the combat.

Each of these three parts can be subdivided into several narrative sections. Section can be of four kinds: some of them are (1) functions and others are (2) connectives (in space, time, state and information connectives); (3) comments of the singer on the narrated events and (4) his direct addresses to the audience punctuate the narrative. These four kinds of units are not neatly divided in their function in the narrative. Thus, a function can be expressed through a connective. Such are narrative sections nos. 3(b), (c) and (e) which are space connectives (sp con), while nos. 2, 3(d), 11(d) and 24(c) are information connectives (inf con). Narrative function "1, Prediction" can be executed as a comment of the singer (the omniscient narrator): section 1(C). On the other hand, section 24, "Notification" is basically an information but can be developed into a complex and many-layered function and appears often as a separate song (such as the "Death of the Mother of the Jugovići").

0.6. Epic symmetry. Usually, there is a confrontation between "good" and "evil" in oral literature. The narrating community identifies with the "good", "virtuous", "smart" characters. These defeat the "evil", "stupid" characters (see Jason 1988). The genre of epic seems to divide its characters somewhat differently. The characters are very much clearly divided into "we, our" and "they, them" who are the enemy. Yet, both sides can be either positive or negative: in so far as a warrior adheres to the knight's code of behavior, he is positively valued, irrelevant to which side he belongs and even irrelevant to whether he won or lost the combat (and has been killed). In some songs about a duel it is not clear who is the "hero" of the song, both warriors having fought equally bravely (see, e.g., King's-son Marko's duel with Musa (or Mina): Hrvatske narodne pjesme, vol. 2, nos. 42, 43, 47, and 48; Karadžić 1935, vol. II, no. 66).

The same symmetry holds for the action of the two parties. The full account of a duel specifically emphasizes this symmetry: the description of the duel is composed of completely parallel actions by the two champions (narrative section 20). The reader will also notice the possibility of inversion of the "we" and "they" characters between the subject and the object narrative roles in sections nos. 3 and 13-18. Actions nos. 21, 22, 24, 25 and 26 are equally applicable to both sides of the combat. Therefore we abstained from using the term "hero" as a label for a tale role.

***

In the following, a short description of the narrative sections and the tale roles shall be given in chapter I. For the sake of demonstration, a work from the South Slavic tradition is analyzed in full in chapter 2.

1. Summary of the model

1.1. Tale roles

All tale roles double, and are found once for each side in the combat, i.e., each role can appear twice in a work, each time filled with characters from one of the sides - "we" or "they" (= the enemy).

Roles of the model-variant "Battle":

- (1) The army, with its various subdivisions (it is a "group character"). The army is composed of a leader and its retinue and the mass of anonymous soldiers.
- (2) Leader of army (emperor, king, prince; sultan, pasha, vazir; chief of a band of brigands; commander-in-chief).

All the other roles can be regarded as the retinue of the leader.

- (3) Subordinate leaders (feudal lords, administrative commanders in the Ottoman empire, generals, chiefs of clans, etc.)
- (4) Champion/warrior as part of an army; may have his own retinue, such as family, servants, comrades.
- (5) Helper (an ally, a supporting army, a supernatural being)
- (6) Spy
- (7) Traitor
- (8) Messenger
- (9) Servant/esquire
- (10) Family (mother, sister, wife, bride, daughter)
- (11) Encoder of prediction (usually supernatural)
- (12) Decoder of prediction
- (13) Medium for message of prediction
- (14) Addressee of prediction

Roles of the model-variant "Duel"

- |                          |                                       |
|--------------------------|---------------------------------------|
| (1a) Champion A ("hero") | (1b) Champion B ("adversary")         |
|                          | (2a, b) Servant/Esquire               |
|                          | (3a, b) Helper                        |
|                          | (4a, b) Traitor                       |
|                          | (5a, b) Family (mother, sister, wife) |

1.2. Narrative sections

The tale roles act in narrative functions. A function consists of a subject role which acts on/in relation to an object tale role. Narrative sections which are built differently are not functions (see, for instance, sections nos. 2 and 12, which have the form of information connectives).
