

Editorial

It is our great pleasure to present the 27th issue of Jabr – European Journal of Bioethics. We are continuing with the fruitful idea of specific thematic sections while keeping enough room for growing bioethical interests.

The general section begins with an important interdisciplinary contribution to environmental ethics in which the theological approach is taken as a basis for arguing for responsible environmental behaviour. Two articles deal with the relevant bioethical topic of people with disabilities. The first presents the results of a pilot study of parents' perceptions and experiences concerning the care for children with disabilities, and the second investigates the representation of disability in lower elementary schools through the analysis of EFL textbooks in Croatia. The next article discusses the ethical aspects of assisted biomedical reproductive policies, giving particular attention to the legislation of the Republic of Srpska.

As indicated, additional space has been given to five papers in the thematic section Animal Bioethics, which are presented in a remarkable Guest Editor's Editorial. I would like to take this opportunity to thank Josip Guć for his cooperation and contribution to this issue of Jabr.

I am also pleased to see the continuation of scientific conferences as three scientific meeting reviews are also a part of this issue, as well as two book reviews.

I would like to thank the members of the Editorial Board, peer reviewers, and all other associates involved in the creation of this issue. Special thanks to the Executive Editor, Managing Editors, and our Language Editors for their tremendous help.

Enjoy reading Jabr!

Igor Eterović